GOOD NEWS STORIES

Refill shops: the once-niche trend that's going mainstream

The UK now has hundreds of refill or zero-waste shops, helping people reduce packaging. Now supermarkets are getting in on the act.

As a sleep-deprived new mother in November 2016, Tash Gorst (main picture) was scrolling through her phone clutching her newborn son when she “fell down the rabbit hole of reading about plastic pollution”. Fast-forward to July 2019 and she had opened Gather, an organic ‘zero-waste’ shop on Peckham’s modish Bellenden Road.

With a mustard-yellow shopfront, nestled between a dim sum restaurant and a hair salon, customers come here to refill their own containers with everything from pasta and rice to sustainable toiletries and beauty products. And it’s not only the produce that is sustainable – the shop is powered by renewable energy and financed by a more ethical bank, while all the units inside have been made from waste materials, mostly by Gorst herself.

Zero-waste shops have become an increasingly common feature on our high streets in recent years amid growing concern about plastic pollution and the climate crisis. Their arrival has helped breathe new life into some town centres. And they’re no longer confined to ‘environmentally aware’ hotspots.

*Loving God,
I am having a really difficult time staying focused on the work still left to do. Summer break is days away, and all I can think about it is leaving this year behind me. Help me stay focused and committed so that when this is over, I can truly rest.*
