Airport Pigs Help Keep the Skies Safe

| Netherlands |

They didn't get badges or uniforms, but they did receive a generous meal allowance. Near Amsterdam's Schiphol Airport, 20 pigs joined a six-week pilot program designed to reduce the number of goose strikes at the busy international hub. The pigs were allowed to settle in a two-hectare sugar-beet field between two of the airport's runways.

The hope was they'd eat up any plant life that appeals to geese and, by their presence, would intimidate other birds in the area, too.

Collisions between birds and aircraft are a nagging problem in aviation—in 2020, there were 150 avian strikes at Schiphol—and these incidents can have serious consequences. Fortunately, the pig patrol appears to have been a success: no bird strikes were recorded during their stay. The airport is currently assessing whether to make the pigs a permanent feature of its overall safety program.
