DAD JOKE OF THE WEEK

I was walking down the street where the houses were numbered: 64K, 128K, 256K, 512K, and 1MB.

It was a trip down memory lane.

Quote for the week

*"Attract what you expect.
Reflect what you desire."
Become what you respect.
Mirror what you admire.*

GOOD NEWS STORIES

Refill shops: the once-niche trend that's going mainstream

"Allurvik" means "place to take your next step" in the language of Inuktitut. It's also the name of the first online language tutoring service for those looking to learn the Inuit language in Canada, or wherever they are logging in. Miali Coley-Sudlovenick is a ten-year tutor of Inuktitut, teaching out of Iqaluit, Nunavut. Her mother endured an upbringing in the federal schools, but still retained her knowledge of Inuktitut enough to share with her daughter, even though she was mocked and abused for using it. Together they vowed, according to CTV, to preserve their language and ensure it lasted throughout the centuries. While translation technologies can make one feel most languages are just saying the same things with different sounds, other programs, such as the Positive Lexicography Project, reveal quite the opposite—that some words simply aren't translatable. Cultures are shaped by their natural environment, their history, their overcoming of challenges, all of which leave an indelible imprint on linguistic development. Have you ever had that feeling of being repeatedly drawn to look out of the window towards the approach to your house in expectation that someone will soon be arriving? "Iktsuarpok" is that feeling summarized in a single word in Inuktitut.

"To be able to advocate for my community and be an activist for all Indigenous people, I need to be able to explain myself in a way that's truly Inuit," Tabisa Kilabuk told CNN.

*Loving God,
It is now summer break.
Help me use this time to do the things that feed my soul, find activities that regenerate my spirit, or get comfortable with silence. The school year is so busy and life filled with so many distractions--help me get comfortable in a distraction-less life.*
